

What stories have been told about the beginnings of this STS formation?

iHub Research has been described as emerging for several reasons: first, in response to a noted lack of African scholars working in and on Information Communications Technology in Development (ICTD) research (Gitau et al. 2010); second, in response to a noted lack of evidence and documentation about the Kenyan technology ecosystem (R. Omenya and W. Ndaiga); third, in response to a noted phenomenon of “fly-in/fly-out” researchers, iHub Research was designed to be a base for and repository of knowledge about the community within the community (A. Okune).
